Daily Report

Summary

- America's stock markets climbed somewhat higher but Europe closed in the red. Asia posted gains this morning.
- Commodity prices rose; bitcoin is below USD 10,000 again.
- The IFO sentiment index disappointed; the US Leading index rose stronger than had been expected

Reversing a three-day losing streak, America's stock markets picked up yesterday. The Dow and the S&P500 nudged higher, while the NASDAQ100 edged 0.1% lower, dropping for the fourth day in a row. One reason for investors' lower risk appetite may be concern that the rising yields add to financing costs, which will negatively affect companies' market value. Hewlett Packard, a winner of the day, jumped 13% higher, as the net revenue in its earnings report has beaten economists' forecasts.

Amid the unsupportive sentiment, the main indices of Europe closed in the red on Thursday. Part of the pessimism stemmed from Wednesday's publication of the minutes of the January FOMC meeting, which revealed that monetary policy decision-makers find an interest rate hike in March increasingly likely. The disappointing figures on German economic sentiment may also have saddened investors. The ECB also published the minutes of its January rate-setting meeting: decision-makers opine that it would be too early to alter their forward guidance, because inflation is still too far from the ECB's near-2% target. In the corporate world, Barclays soared 4.4% after announcing to more than double the dividend per share, despite the GBP 1.9 billion loss in the recent financial year. British American Tobacco shrank 2.2%; its pre-tax profit quadrupled in 2017, but the volume of cigarette sales contracted by 2.6%.

In line with the prevailing trend in Europe, the BUX fell 0.8%, with all blue chips dropping. The minutes of NordTelekom board of directors' meeting reveal that the internet service provider decided to raise its capital and acquire Pine Telecommunications Ltd, to establish a new company, Nord Global Services, with headquarters in London.

Asia's market closed with gains this morning.

Government bond yields fell in the USA and Germany on Thursday, reversing Wednesday's rise.

The US dollar weakened against the EUR yesterday but it was seen strengthening again this morning. Bitcoin dived 5.2%, to re-visit below-10,000-dollar territories. Commodity prices rose: gold added 0.5% and the WTI oil upped 1.8%.

Important sentiment indicators came out on the eurozone's largest economy. Germany's IFO economic sentiment index stood at 115.4 in February, missing analysts' forecast of 117. Nevertheless, the indicator is at its second highest since 1991. The data released on US economy were encouraging: the Leading index rose 1% in January from the previous month, overshooting analysts' prediction of 0.5%. The indicator has been rising for the third month in a row. In Japan, the consumer price index accelerated to 1.4% year/year in January from 1.0% in the previous month, and the core price index grew by 0.9%, just like in December.

Germany's Q4 GDP breakdown and the January reading of the eurozone's inflation statistics are due out today.
